Apparently, Twittersters believe in a united #TeamUSA. "Grit, perseverance, and optimism," tweeted @DaveinDC, who ironically was the one who hyped #GiveEmSomeGrit after the U.S. was screwed out of a good draw in 2014. "Never say die, nothing is impossible," tweeted @KareemSmyth. These tweets were the exact opposite of the thoughts that Secretary of State John Kerry was expressing earlier in the day. Kerry, who was on a foreign trip, delivered a speech about American values, calling out "women in Mali who endure slavery" as well as people working in factories who "make peanuts." He also criticized American athletes for their "weak performances." "Our strategy in the Olympics has been to be aggressive and play against these guys," Kerry said, referring to the Cubans, according to The Associated Press. "But I think we need to have a strategic reevaluation and recognize that we might not be as well-positioned as some of our competitors. We've got to have a national-security reset." According to the AP, after President Barack Obama met with Cuban President Raul Castro, he "assured the communist leader that Washington still intends to roll back the missile and diplomatic relations that President Obama had eased with the island nation nearly five years ago." "We're going to give it all we have and we're going to succeed in the first game," U.S. forward Abby Wambach said on the 82157476af
